

Cultivating Desert Waste

Irrefragible Will Make Gardens of Eden

For the Garden of Eden is going to flower again. Within the next three years, says the inventor of a desert waste for 3,000 years will be transformed into fruitful, verdant gardens.

But instead of "every tree that the Lord had planted," as Genesis records, there will be a forest of masts, cotton and wheat.

This changing of the face and the desert will be effected by sowing a great barberry across the River Tigris to the Euphrates.

British engineers—Messrs. Balfour and Huxley, of London—have secured this barberry from the desert for £1,000,000. It will take three years to complete.

The barberry will irrigate nearly 15,000 square miles of land, between the Tigris and the Euphrates.

In that case, according to both modern research and Hebrew tradition, the "Garden of Eden" will be restored.

To-day it is a trackless desert, completely without cultivation, except in occasional oases and half-mile wide oases.

It is not a desert, but a garden. It is not a desert, but a garden. It is not a desert, but a garden.
